Spam Defined: Topmost Google Match [What is Spam?]

<https://www.internetsociety...>

Definitions of spam

The classic definition of spam is unsolicited bulk messages, that is, messages sent to multiple recipients who did not ask for them. The problems caused by spam are due to the combination of the unsolicited and bulk aspects; the quantity of unwanted messages swamps messaging systems and drowns out the messages that recipients do want. [2]

For practical and legal reason, different organizations have different definitions of spam. When a recipient gets a single message, it can be difficult to tell whether that message was part of a group sent in bulk, so a common alternative definition is unsolicited commercial e-mail, on the theory that most unwanted mail is commercial. Many mailbox providers consider it to be mail their users don't want, or mail their users complain about, since their goal is to minimize the support costs associated with complaints. In practice these varying definitions describe approximately the same set of messages.

In countries that have laws related to spam, the most common legal definition is unsolicited commercial e-mail, along with mail that is misleading or fraudulent. The United States is an outlier; its CAN SPAM act only forbids commercial e-mail that is fraudulent, or was sent after the recipient told the sender to stop. Non-commercial mail generally gets more lenient legal treatment than commercial mail.

Where spam appears

Spam has been a problem in many different media, and invariably arises whenever a medium allows people to send many messages without per-message charges. A short-lived flat-rate telegraph service in the 1800s closed down due to spam in Morse code.

On the Internet, spam has affected usenet (the shared bulletin board system), e-mail, instant messaging, blogs and blog comments, and social media including Facebook and Twitter. It has also appeared as junk faxes, VoIP telephony, Instant Message (AOL Instant Message aka AIM, Apple iMessage, etcetera) and SMS (phone text messages.)

Spamming techniques have evolved as conditions have changed. For example, junk faxes were initially a local problem, as advertisers with new cheap fax machines used them to make free local calls, but high toll rates kept them from making long distance calls. Now, with toll rates in much of the world approaching zero, junk faxes are as likely to come from the other side of the world as from around the corner. On the Internet, as users have moved from one service to another, e.g., from Geocities to MySpace to Facebook to Pinterest, spammers have followed them.

What spam does

The original impetus for spam was advertising. A famous early usenet spam was from a lawyer advertising immigration service (“green card lottery”) and early e-mail spams advertised computer equipment, purported blueprints for atomic bombs, and magazine subscriptions. Since spam is so cheap, and is often anonymous, it is also popular for marginally or completely illegal schemes including fake drugs, pump and dump stock touts, money mule recruiting, and advance fee fraud (often called 4-1-9 after the section of the Nigerian criminal code that outlaws it.)

Some spam also does non-commercial advertising. There has always been a modest amount of religious spam, and surges of political spam before elections. Although these kinds often have a different legal status from commercial spam, the practical problems they present are the same, and providers generally treat them the same.

An increasing motivation for spam is to distribute malware, either by including an infected program or document directly in the spam, or by linking to a web site with infected content. These spams generally contain misleading headlines and content to encourage victims to open them, e.g., pretending to include a receipt for an expensive order the victim never made.

The other major use of spam is phishing, impersonating a trusted party to steal the victim’s credentials. Phish spam often pretends to be from banks, ISPs, or mail providers, telling victims to confirm or update their accounts. Links in the phish lead to a web site that resembles the real organization’s login page, so the victim will enter his or her credentials, which are then sent to the phisher.

Spear-Phishing takes phishing one step further, where the miscreants specifically target organizations or individuals who are likely to have access to high-value assets. For example, determining who the financial staff are in a given company may allow access to bank accounts; similarly, specific technical staff may have login credentials to organizational infrastructure that can be compromised with a specially crafted, socially engineered spear phishing attack.

Notes

[1] Sanford Wallace's lifelong abuse of services that don't belong to him is an analog for the development from annoyance to criminality. Wallace came into the illicit advertising by way of junk faxing, taking advantage of the relatively low cost of faxing (locally, at least) until he was told to stop by law enforcement agencies. He moved into the field of email spamming, and by 1996 had been sued by the major ISPs of the day. He announced his retirement, and became a D.J. and club owner in New Hampshire for a time, but soon reverted to his criminal activities; He shifted gears and began to distribute spyware, and again was sued in 2006 to put a stop to that activity. He turned his gaze upon social media networks, and began to spam MySpace in 2007-2008 and was again sued to stop that activity. In 2009 he began to send phishing messages to Facebook users, and the social network filed suit against him. The activity continued, and as he stole additional user credentials, a criminal suit was brought against him. Wallace was arrested for his phishing activities in 2011 and awaits trial for several serious charges.

[2] The name comes from an old Monty Python skit in which actors in a movie lot canteen dressed in Viking costumes chant spam, Spam, SPAM so loudly and repeatedly as to drown out everything else.

I was a former patient of Doctor Madinger in the Denver metro area in 2012/2016 while I was under a hate, harassment, and retaliation attack from the community starting with my residency in 2014 within the HIV Community residency. At the time that I was being seen by Dr. Madinger, I was complaining about this community harassment but no one would take my complaints seriously enough for me to be able to identify the haters and put a stop to it. This was extremely effecting my mental health. Doctor Madinger was very well informed that I had a prior incident with hate and retaliation from an experience from Oakland CA in 2005. I, in fact, made a protest promise to long walk home from Oakland to San Bernardino issued to the Attorney in the eviction case written May 20th 2006. This promise to long walk, would be a long aids walk of course. You see, Dr. Madinger was my doctor when I made my attempt to fulfill this walk promise in September of 2013. Doctor Madinger counselled me as an individual patient, but did not progress this long walk to community interests like it should have taken hold. This long walk began September 21st 2013, the International Day Of Peace. The route of the walk was planned to be over 500 miles.
